If we see a "small" flash from the barrel of a gun, and we know the trajectory of the bullet, then how can we track the bullet if it leaves little traces or has ejected and penetrated the wall? If it penetrates then it's potentially a bioweapon! A: You don't even need the bullet to leave a trace, a fragment from the casing or the barrel can be used to id the bullet. All you need is something that breaks, so you can retrieve the material. A rifle bullet is made of steel which has a steel content between 50% and 90%, depending on the bullet design. Steel is actually a chemical compound, a steel bullet will have the composition of: C = 50.00-52.67% O = 29.33-31.00% H = 0.00-1.67% N = 0.00-2.67% S = 0.00-4.33% If you have the bullet's weight, you can calculate the steel content (percentage): const double BulletWeight = 7 * g; double SteelContent = BulletWeight / ((C + N) * 2.0); where g is the weight of a gram. So steel content is calculated as the weight of the bullet divided by the weight of the sum of the atoms of its steel component. The barrel of a rifle is usually made of a steel, a barrel is made from a steel that is almost pure. The composition of this steel is: C = 60.00-65.00% O = 24.00-26.00% H = 0.00-1.00% N = 0.00-1.20% S = 0.00-0.60% To calculate the steel content of a barrel, you'll need to know the weight of the bullet. On the other hand, bullets usually have a coating of copper or tungsten to make them penetrate better
